Butter Mold, 1920
YO1-2011.09-01-01
Gift of Joann Larkey

Making butter at home has made a come back. This piece is a butter stamp from the 1920's. While now butter can easily be made in a stand mixer, in the 1920's one would still have to spend about 30 minutes hand cranking the butter churn to get the cream to separate.

After the butter separates from the buttermilk, the butter must be washed to get the remaining buttermilk out of it. This process can take an additional 20 minutes. In the 1920's smaller churns, the result would only be about a half a pound of butter.

Once the butter was clean, it could be shaped. That is where this object comes in. After the butter is shaped into a rough ball, it could be stamped with this tool to create a thick disk stamped with the design. See this object and more on our online collections database.
